Kyle's Korner

Is there a difference between joy and happiness? While Christianity offers both, in a sense, there are some key differences for us to pay attention to.

Happiness is defined as “the state of being happy,” according to Google Dictionary, and I’m sure any other dictionary will offer a similar definition. We may think of it in terms of satisfaction in life. Many pursue happiness and contentment in various forms - physical, mental, spiritual. However, the pursuit of happiness rarely leads to anything permanent, for when we finally find happiness and contentment, it rarely sticks around. At the first sign of trouble, it is forgotten, and the pursuit of it must begin again.

Joy, however, while it has a very similar definition, is different, at least as I look at it in the spiritual sense. James encourages his readers to “count it all joy when you fall into various trials” (James 1:2, NKJV). How is it even possible to hold on to joy in the face of trials? Joy, unlike happiness, is not fleeting. True joy remains, but only because of our faith in God. James gives at least one reason why: “...knowing that the testing of your faith produces patience... that you may be perfect and complete, lacking nothing” (James 1:3-4). Joy sees beyond the present to what is ahead of us - Christian growth and the supplying of everything we need to fight our battles and, ultimately, eternal victory.

Joy in our trials is possible, but only through faith in God. While the world may promise happiness, true joy is only found in Christ. In your pursuit of happiness, I pray that you are not deceived. Pursue spiritual joy, instead.
