

Kyle's Korner

While riding with my mom to the singing Friday, I mentioned that I needed to write my article for the bulletin. After telling her how I usually come up with things to write about, she gave me some advice: "Write about what you have learned this week." (I normally do this sort of thing anyway, but...)

So, what have I learned this week? I have learned that brothers and sisters in Christ (supposedly) can be very mean to each other. Maybe this doesn't happen often, and maybe it isn't widespread, but I am amazed at the behavior of some members of the church toward others! To be mean towards our own brethren is completely against the teachings of the New Testament. Jesus commanded that we love one another and He reminds us that we, within the church, should be known by our love, one toward another. (John 13:35) Paul writes that we should bear with one another in love. (Ephesians 4:2) This takes a great deal of patience at times, but it is something that we, as Christians, should work toward.

I have also learned this week, however, that brethren can be very kind, loving and supportive of one another. There have been times this week in which I was the one doing the loving and supporting, but there have also been occasions in which I have received love and support (at least once intending to be the support, but then receiving the support). Having brethren like these makes my service to God and others much easier, and soothes my conscience of circumstances beyond my control. I am thankful for our members and others who have been there when I needed them most.

I have brothers and sisters who are the greatest example to me of what I should be, but I also have brothers and sisters who err in their dealings with fellow Christians. I hope that I have not erred in any of my dealings with you. I want to be a good example and source of encouragement in every possible way. I hope we are encouraging one another toward Heaven.
