

Kyle's Korner

I have had the wonderful privilege of working with children for the last several years. Whereas I have primarily worked with preschoolers in the past, these last few weeks have given me the opportunity to work with older children in the Murfreesboro City school system. Most of our kids on the busses are great kids, who are mostly respectful of authority. There are those, however, that will push the limits of your patience with them.

In various conversations with different individuals about what I have chosen as my secular job, they have agreed in their concern for the future of our nation and world based upon the raising of "kids these days." This is something I have heard before, and I do believe there is much to be said about how kids are currently being raised. The attitudes and disposition of the children I work with are almost always a reflection of the speech and actions of their parents. I'm not a parent, myself, but it doesn't necessarily take a parent to see the source and impact of troubling behavior.

So what is the source and impact I'm referring to? Let's start with the source. I see it in many adults, as well, that our world is greatly affected by a lack of faith in God. Many do not have the peace they are looking for because they do not know Jesus. And because many parents do not believe, our children are raised not knowing Jesus. They face their problems alone, seeking the peace that only comes from God in the world in which it can't be found.

And this source impacts all of us because we live and interact with the generation that has been raised not knowing Jesus. There is much unrest in our world for this very reason, and seemingly nothing we can do.

The best we can do is to take Jesus with us in our own lives in hopes that others will see and long for Him in their own. And pray. When we can't change our world, we can trust in God to help us, always.
